The Learning school concept

The Learning School project is one school self-evaluation model, which in line with current social developments that have seen young people become more active and participative in contributing to debate about matters which affect them, engages students as the evaluators of learning. School self-evaluation which engages students redresses outdated democratic imbalances in evaluation, encourages students to be participative and active contributors to learning evaluation and to be more responsible learners.

The project has a uniquely international dimension, as the members which make up the research group represent the schools of an international partnership of schools known as the Global Classroom. Those nominated to become Learning School participants are typically either current or recent high school students. Over the course diverse range of countries and social, cultural and economic situations. This translate to a rich social, cultural, personal and academic learning experience for group members in particular, but also for students in participant schools, host families, wider communities and experts.

The Learning school 9 topic

This year's research project for Learning School 9 is investigating 'A Curriculum for living and learning in the 21st Century'. From this we have chosen to focus on developing a Global Campus as part of the curriculum for the 21st Century. This will try to investigate the ways in which international relations could help young people face the challenges of the future.
